A 16-acre farm located on Salt Spring Island, the site of this house is bisected from east to west by a long row of mature Douglas fir trees. Given the site's remoteness and the owner and architect's unique design intent for a structure in complete complement with the natural landscape, and transformable into an open-air pavilion, wood was deemed the best choice in material for many reasons, including its versatility in cost-effectively addressing the structural/large span challenges and its local availability.
