

B.C. residents may be tightening purse strings, but their insurance coverage is taking a hit

-- TD's 2nd Annual State of Insurance Report reveals the impact of an uncertain economy on British Columbians' insurance --

VANCOUVER (June 27, 2012) — Although the majority of British Columbians say they consider insurance to be an essential element of their financial planning, the uncertain economic climate has led many to reconsider their coverage. According to the TD Insurance State of Insurance Report – an annual report by TD Insurance to understand Canadians' habits, attitudes and knowledge about insurance – 44% of British Columbians are less likely to purchase a new policy or buy enough insurance due to the economic environment.

The second annual report found some British Columbians have decided not to make claims in order to keep their premiums low (29%) or to avoid a high deductible (30%). Even more alarming, 22% of B.C. residents have cancelled or forgone insurance altogether in an effort to save money. As a result, B.C. residents are among the most likely to admit they don't think they have enough insurance (23% versus 19% nationally).

"If you want to save money and preserve your personal finances, the last thing you should be doing is curbing your insurance coverage," says Dave Minor, Vice President, TD Insurance. "Especially in an uncertain economy, insurance is an important part of financial planning. For working families, it's one of the best ways to ensure your assets and income remain intact in the event that something unexpected happens. Speaking with your insurance provider is the first step to cutting costs. They can help you look for additional savings and tailor your coverage to ensure you're getting the best value."

According to the report, the majority of B.C. residents (82%) say they consider insurance an integral part of their financial planning. Yet, nearly half (44%) don't have any life insurance, a product Minor says should be an important component of Canadians' retirement planning solutions.

"Our report unveiled a serious disconnect between what British Columbians think and what they do when it comes to insurance," Minor says. "Residents of B.C. say they understand the importance of insurance, yet many admit they don't have enough insurance to protect their assets and loved ones, now and into the future."

Not all British Columbians think honesty is the best policy

British Columbians are most likely to say they always tell the truth on their insurance applications (80% versus 76% nationally). But not everyone in B.C. is quite so honest: 17% admit they have not been completely truthful or omitted information when filling out an insurance application.

"Telling a little white lie or failing to disclose important information to your insurance provider can put your insurance coverage at risk, and may even be considered fraud. It's very important to be open and honest with your insurer, so you have the peace of mind knowing you are covered if something unexpected happens," says Minor.

According to the Insurance Bureau of Canada, organized insurance crime – which includes insurance fraud, auto theft and filing fraudulent claims – costs insurers and policyholders about $542 million annually.

Wet conditions may be common in B.C., but extreme weather is causing concern for consumer's coverage

With household expenses under the microscope, many Canadians admit they're concerned about external factors that may affect their coverage, including extreme weather. Water damage is now the leading cause of property damage in Canada, amounting to approximately $1.7 billion in claims annually.

According to the report, 70% of British Columbians are concerned that a natural disaster won't be covered by their insurance policy. As a result, many British Columbians are taking precautions to help protect their homes and valuables from severe weather and natural disasters:

- 63% ensure they have an adequate number of working smoke detectors and fire extinguishers
- 46% check their properties for blockages that prevent water draining away from their home
- 37% remove weak branches and trees on their properties that could fall on their homes or on power lines
- 27% of British Columbians keep a detailed inventory of their valuables in a safe place
- 17% choose landscaping that helps resist soil erosion

"Some extreme weather-related damage may not be covered by a basic home insurance, like water damage caused by flooding, damage to antennas and satellite dishes as a result of strong wind, and damage caused by earthquakes," says Minor. "Speak to your insurance provider if you're unsure about your coverage."

British Columbians are more confused than last year about their coverage

"Understanding exactly what you are covered for is the key to protecting yourself and your loved ones," says Minor. Yet, the State of Insurance Report found 34% of B.C. residents are not sure what they are covered for (versus 23% in 2011) and 62% of British Columbians don't bother to read the fine print of their policies thoroughly (compared with 79% in 2011).

"It's unrealistic to know your policy line by line," says Minor. "But just like you wouldn't buy a car without knowing what features you're paying for, it's important to understand what protection your insurance can offer. At the end of the day, insurance should give you peace of mind."

About the TD Insurance 2nd Annual State of Insurance Report
